

Morris School District wastes $27,000

To the Editor:

I find it very disturbing to read that the Morris School District spent more than $27,000 on legal fees to contest the location of the Unity Charter School.

After all, the parents of the children who attend the school have chosen to have their children attend school there. If it does not upset them, then why should the Morris School District waste money contesting the location?

Instead, this money should have been spent on programs such as Reading Recovery. Children in the district are being denied this program because of a lack of money. So how can they have $27,000 to put in lawyers pockets?

Practices like this are why my children no longer attend schools in the Morris School District. They are now at a school where the needs of the students come first.
